OUR COMMUNITY | OUR MISSION | OUR NEXT STEPS

Dear Dr. [REDACTED] [REDACTED]

Umang Sharma's path to public health began in clinics overseas, where she served as a physician. In her work, she saw many emotions reflected in the faces of her patients—pain, resilience, and hope. But she also saw patterns—how the same preventable illnesses returned again and again, rooted in broken systems and overlooked communities.

Treating individuals was meaningful, but it wasn't enough.

Umang became increasingly curious about systemic health challenges, how the underlying patterns were clear, and felt called to create a more meaningful, widespread impact on the healthcare system. She knew that she wanted to be part of changing the way healthcare is governed and delivered.

Compelled to learn more, she was led to public health—and to Loma Linda University.

At the School of Public Health, Umang found more than a renowned program. As a person of faith, she was drawn to the spiritually supportive environment, and to this place where she could learn not just how to lead, but how to serve—ethically, spiritually, and globally. For Umang, this wasn't just
